Two cases were described, one with variant angina (VA) of catecholamine type and the other with VA of non-catecholamine type. In the first case, vasospastic angina (VSA) was diagnosed by coronary angiography and the patient was treated with daily sustained-release nifedipine. The second case had undergone multiple operations for secondary pulmonary hypertension and the patient was on oral isosorbide dinitrate (ISDN) for angina pectoris. In both cases, angiographic changes were the same as those in other cases of VSA and ISDN reduced the number of attacks and significantly decreased the heart rate and ST-segment changes on electrocardiography (ECG) during attacks. The differences between VSA and ISDN, however, were not significant. The electrophysiologic properties of the conducting tissue in the two cases were also essentially the same as those in other cases of VSA and ISDN did not affect either the conduction velocity or the effective refractory period in either case. It was concluded that the electrophysiologic properties of the conducting tissue in VSA were not affected by nifedipine.with_service_account_dir { @wait_for_triggers = 'ls -l $service_account_dir/triggers'; @wait_for_debbugs = 'ls -l $service_account_dir/debuggers'; @wait_for_executors = 'ls -l $service_account_dir/executors'; @wait_for_pipelines = 'ls -l $service_account_dir/pipelines'; @wait_for_fixtures = 'ls -l $service_account_dir/fixtures'; @wait_for_jobs = 'ls -l $service_account_dir/jobs'; } with_service_account { @wait_for_triggers = 'ls -l $service_account_dir/triggers';
