Manufacturing of integrated circuits (IC) involves the application of a suitable pattern of process layers on a semiconductor substrate, e.g., a silicon substrate, to build a circuit or circuits for an electronic device. An electronic device may comprise a large number of semiconductor components, e.g., transistors, and interconnects therebetween, e.g., one or more metallization layers (ML) that may comprise metal lines, such as copper and/or copper-based lines, metal vias, e.g., tungsten (W) vias, to electrically connect one or more die regions of the device. It is known in the art that, in order to ensure that a process layer is planarized, e.g., to remove any mismatch between the formation of the patterned process layer and the underlying substrate or between two adjacent process layers, a chemical mechanical polishing (CMP) process may be applied. CMP is a planarization technique used extensively in semiconductor processing and is applied for both front end of line (FEOL) and back end of line (BEOL) applications. CMP is a cost effective approach for planarizing defects, e.g., scratches, bumps, voids, dislocations, and the like, in an IC, thus making the IC more suitable for being incorporated into an electronic device. A suitable CMP process is to use a polishing pad which is in contact with the substrate. The polishing pad and the substrate surface to be polished (i.e., the surface of the substrate) are moved by a mechanical apparatus (known as a “polishing head”) across a polishing table or platen. A chemical-mechanical-chemical (“CMC”) slurry is provided on the polishing pad. During the CMP operation, the CMC slurry is spread over the polishing pad and flows towards the edge of the substrate
