Monday, February 11, 2009 How the Puerto Rican Taco Bell is changing the world, one taco at a time If you think fast food restaurants are bad, fast food restaurants in developing countries are infinitely worse. Anywhere from eight to 12 people crowd around a single table in filthy restaurants with countertops of stone or cement. The table usually contains a vinyl-covered folding table with three holes, two plastic sheets of stainless steel, a big bowl of chips, a glass of something that doesn't look like water, and a sugary drink. Some of the customers don't look like they need anything more than a bite to eat. The menus are printed on handmade paper, or if plastic, yellow or blue. Sometimes the menus are on the wall, sometimes they're in piles on the floor.
