.L'eau de Lourdes autre parole . The life and work of Daisaku Ikeda, an Anthology, Volume 3 . Life, the origin of all knowledge and the way to its universal distribution, arnold geiger biography, Daisaku Ikeda biography Daisaku Ikeda - New Human Revolution The New Human Revolution, Volume 1, The Daisaku Ikeda Educational Project, Edited by Robert F. As an example, what are your suggestions for changes? A few examples of some of the changes I would make: - The introduction - I would have it open with a summary of Ikeda's life, something like: "A few sentences about the creator of this project. A short biography of Daisaku Ikeda, discussing his life and work and his influence on education. The summary should briefly give insight into how the book is organized, e.g. "a global vision based on education and the theory of knowledge. A good question to begin this section would be "What is knowledge?" - Questions in the last three chapters (I understand that there are many more chapters than that in the book) - I would use this question: "What is knowledge in the real sense?" In my opinion, the answer is a bit too broad. I think this question leads to an answer that is very similar to the answers to a question like "What is God?". The Daisaku Ikeda Educational Project - The New Human Revolution, Volume 1 36. Do you think Daisaku Ikeda's educational philosophy can be implemented into the modern world? Some people have spoken about "disobedience", how can this be done? I think the most important thing is to break the major barrier that has been created in our minds: the barrier between reality and illusion. Most of us have become so attuned to the world of illusion that it has become so "natural" for us that we hardly notice that it is not reality, that it is only a product of our minds, and that it is not universal and can be different from one culture to another. In other words, the "illusion" is universal, but the perception of reality is not. That is why the changing of perception, of the way we see the world, is so important. The attitude of breaking through illusions and becoming aware of the real world that lies beyond is key to breaking the barriers that stand in the way of social
