Jul 2, 2017 Homework was designed to keep the parents informed and let them get their hands dirty. Parents, administrators, and researchers have long argued over the benefits and detriments of homework. Homework is an example of a common misconception that less is more. While no one would think twice of doing more homework at this point in the semester, it does tend to fall by the wayside. However, over the course of a semester, the benefits do outweigh the costs.

Jun 27, 2020 What are the pros of homework? The primary pros of homework for students are that it: Encourages students to complete assignments on time. Encourages students to take responsibility for their assignments. Provides parents with a chance to monitor their children's learning progress. Provides students with a chance to review course material in a low-pressure atmosphere. Provides students with more time to study and practice skills that they are learning in their classes. The most cited justification for homework from experts is that it requires the completion of tasks as part of one's daily life that are not necessarily directly related to the class being studied. Being out of class gives students a chance to do something outside of the classroom, thereby learning an extra skill. In addition, the responsibilities of having to complete homework can be a good motivator for a student to complete work and thus stay on task.

Jun 26, 2020 The Pros of Homework Kubler-Ross (1955) argued that homework is an opportunity for our children to face certain uncomfortable situations. The main purpose of this is to help students develop resilience, which is especially necessary in times like this. As for the pros of homework, they can be broken into three groups. 1) Homework is beneficial to student's success. 2) It makes school more fun. 3) It helps students learn the material better and enjoy school.
