Detection of Giardia lamblia in water supply and treatment plants by enzyme immunoassay and polymerase chain reaction. Giardia lamblia is a parasite of humans and can cause severe diarrhea in immunocompromised and in malnourished children. In this study, we compared the efficacy of the enzyme immunoassay, commercially available Giardia lamblia antigen (GSA) and polymerase chain reaction (PCR) assays for the detection of Giardia lamblia. Giardia trophozoites and cysts from human and animal sources were spiked into the water supply at concentrations of 0.5, 1, 2, 4, 8, and 16 cysts/100 ml. Giardia cysts from animal sources were also spiked into river water and treated drinking water at concentrations of 4, 8, 16, and 32 cysts/100 ml. Sample collection occurred over a 1-year period (June to May). The enzyme immunoassay test demonstrated 94.2% sensitivity and 100% specificity. The PCR test was 95.3% sensitive and 100% specific. Both tests were 100% specific when compared with a Giardia cell culture assay. The PCR assay detected Giardia cysts in treated drinking water at 2 cysts/100 ml in 1 year. Results for untreated and treated river water were negative. A Giardia antigen demonstrated a decrease in detectability of cysts in treated drinking water at 2
