Cells growing with low zinc are highly Zn-deficient and can grow only when supplied with micromolar concentrations of Zn. We examined the effect of Zn source on the cell morphology and intracellular Zn distribution of Zn-limited wild-type cells grown on Zn-deficient medium. Wild-type yeast cells grown on Zn-deficient medium were highly elongated and slightly shrunken, with the spindle pole body (SPB) clearly located toward the apex of the elongated cell. In contrast, Zn-limited wild-type cells grown on Zn-supplemented medium were round, and the SPB was located toward the middle of the cell. The aberrant elongation of cells was not observed when the medium was supplemented with a lower concentration of Zn. Low-Zn wild-type cells contained a high level of Zn in the cytoplasm, whereas the Zn level in the nucleus was not so high. Cells grown on Zn-deficient medium showed normal nuclear morphology; however, the Zn level in the nucleus was very low. A granular pattern, as well as the Zn level of the nucleus, was apparent in cells grown on Zn-deficient medium supplemented with ZnSO4. Chromatin staining with DAPI and electron microscopy of the nucleus showed that there were many chromatin aggregates in nuclei of the 1cdb3666d
