melanoma are limited. We have developed an experimental treatment strategy that is capable of modifying the microenvironment in malignant melanoma cells, including modulating tumor growth and metastasis. Three experimental drugs were designed to target enzymes in specific pathways associated with melanoma cell proliferation and invasion. The prodrug analog 4-bromo-4-deoxy-N-methyl-beta-D-galactosylamine was designed to target beta-galactosidase in melanoma cells. The enzyme is associated with the formation of galactose-containing glycoproteins that play an important role in the melanoma cell invasive phenotype. The beta-galactosyltransferase inhibitor N-bromoacetylgalactosamine was designed to inhibit beta-1,4-N-acetylgalactosaminyltransferase in melanoma cells. The enzyme is involved in the biosynthesis of alpha-galactose residues and has been implicated in melanoma cell invasion. The inhibitor N-bromoacetylmannosamine was designed to target N-acetylglucosaminyltransferase. This enzyme has been implicated in the synthesis of alpha-linked sialic acid residues and has been implicated in the inhibition of melanoma cell invasion. The prodrug analog and the enzyme inhibitors were conjugated to polylysine to enhance their uptake by melanoma cells. Their potential antitumor efficacy was assessed in two different in vivo models of human melanoma. The prodrug was tested in vitro against a panel of human melanoma cell lines,
