Programming without timeout Is there a way to check if the connection to the server is alive without a timeout? I tried to send a packet to the server and receive a response, but it is impossible to receive a packet when the connection is not alive. A: When sending a packet over a socket connection, you can normally tell if it was delivered or not, but it's not possible to tell when a packet was not received. This means that you can only tell for a given time that the connection is alive - after that time a packet might have been received, and your timeout was not enough to see it. To work around this, instead of looking at the length of the returned packet, use TCP state (i.e. has the SYN flag been seen?) and keep on retrying connections that are in error state. This is typically done using the programming language's retry functionality, but you can roll your own or use a layer above that. The overall aim of this proposal is to investigate the molecular mechanisms that facilitate DNA replication in S. cerevisiae. S. cerevisiae has a single type of chromosomal DNA and only one replication origin at each chromosome. As a result, most replication origins are inactive until their time of use. Our laboratory has demonstrated that the product of the FLC1/CLB2/CLB6 gene complex, the FLC2/CLB5 protein, cooperates with the G2/M-cyclins to regulate replication origin activity and it is this cooperation with the G2/M-cyclins that we plan to study in detail. We have used the fact that the FLC2/CLB5 protein has an essential S. cerevisiae homolog to demonstrate that it functions as a cell cycle regulated DNA replication factor. This work will allow us to study the interactions of the homologous FLC2/CLB5 protein with other factors, which are key to determining its role in the cell cycle. Most importantly, the identification and isolation of genes that interact with FLC2 b7e8fdf5c8
